While these things occurred without, there was deep sorrow, mingled with fearless determination extinguished. The water failing, the undaunted women procured some eggs, which were broken, and their contents thrown upon the fire. Their next resource was the bloody waistcoat of their husband and brother-in-law; the blood with which this was profusely saturated checked the further progress of the flames, which, with a few subsequent efforts, were at length fully subdued. The savage foe yielded, and the fruitful expedients of female courage triumphed. One Indian, in bitter disappointment, fired at his unseen enemy through the boards, but did not injure her. They now descended from the roof. About the time the attack commenced, a young man named McAndre escaped on horseback in view of the Indians. Supposing he would give the alarm to the older settlements; as soon as the savages descended from the roof, a few of them climbed some trees in the vicinity and instituted a sharp look-out. While in the trees, one of them fired a second ball into the loft of the cabin, which cut to pieces a ball of yarn hanging near the head of Mrs. Cook, but without doing further injury. Soon after, they threw the body of the dead Indian into the adjacent creek, and fled precipitately. A few moments after the Cooks were attacked, Martin, in conversation with McAndre near his cabin, was fired...
