Not illustrated. 1893 edition. Excerpt: . the blues were on one side and half on the other, and vice versa of the reds, the parties shouting and halloing, men on horseback and women as much excited as the men. When the die is cast the winners take their prizes and leave for home. Sometimes a race was run between two persons, champions, from three to five miles, and the amount staked reached $500 worth of livestock and dry goods. In these races, men and women who had large stakes, as their favorite racer lagged, ran after him, hooting and prodding with a sharp stick, so intense was the excitement. There was one advantage which these Indians had over horse racers of this day. Although the excitement was great and betting strong, and the gambling dissipating to morals, there was so far as we know, no drinking. The word Aw-op, meaning Apache, was often used by the Pima mother, to still the crying of her little one. The old warriors here, who can show the scars of many a wound received in fights, will soon be no more. Many years ago there was but little for which to fight, except the hunting grounds and a few slaves. But since the Pimas have become raisers of horses and cattle, war with these Apaches is no longer an object. The Apaches had the advantage over the Pimas having a very large country to roam over, as some of our military officers well...
