LECTURE I OF THE USE of RESPIRATION in the Animal Oeconomy. OON after the Circulation of the Blood was discovered, and the Certainty of it established beyond dispute-, it was readily allowed by almost every one, that the Health, Strength, . and Nourishment of the Body was owing to the Bloods being duly and constantly circulated thro every Part of it; and that in whatever Way those Parts were nourished, the Nourishment itself was conveyed by. the Blood: and consequently, that the Blood must, in a healthy State of the Body, be ib constituted as to contain the Particles designed by Nature for Nutrition; and at the fame time to preserve itself in such a Begree of Fluidity, as would enable it to pass thro every the minutest Vessel. This led the Way to an Enquiry, How this particular Constitution of the Blood was so duly kept up whilst it was in the Body, which every one knew it would immediately lose upon being taken out of it. The Lungs were soon fixed upon as the most likely of all the Parts of the Body for performing this necessary Office; and not without very good Reason. For, besides that it followed from the Make of the Heart, and the Distribution of the Pulmonary Veins and Artery, that no Portion of Blood, how minute soever, could perform two Circulations, without passing thro the Lungs; there was an obvious Difference in the Colour of the Blood after...
